The two-third pint, otherwise known as the schooner, became a legal measure in October 2011. Research from brewing giant Molson Coors showed that 40% of British drinkers would order a two-third pint if it were on offer, despite only 10% of people being aware of it at the time.

Craft beer should be about choice; not just what flavours you want, but what size glass you want to be drinking it from. The smaller measures mean that the beer stays cool to the bottom of the glass, it assists in responsible consumption and it achieves an acceptable price point to help a craft beer work for both, retailer and consumer.

LWC CRAFT CLUB

GIVE THE PEOPLE WHAT THEY WANT!

So, assuming you haven't lived under a rock for the past ~10 years, you've probably heard of 'the rise of craft beer', and if you haven't considered including it into your range, well, we'd like to help you with that. Beer-drinking habits have changed, and so has the choice out there. If you're finding that your business is going flat – if you need a little more hop in your step – then beer just might be the solution.

Even if you're a newbie, you're probably aware that craft beer is a thing and there's a good chance you've tried it, but maybe you've thought: how does one define craft beer? What constitutes craft beer? Why is it so crafty? We asked the Beer Sommelier, Annabel Smith, these questions and here's what she said: "I would describe craft beer as full of flavour, made with premium ingredients by an independent brewer, with skill and care."

Here at LWC we've chosen a few entry-level craft beers from reputable UK brewers. You'll have a selection of two beers a month available nationally at a promotional price of £76.99 per 30ltr keg. (For the rest of the maths and graphs, just take a gander at the back of this poster.) To make it even easier, all of the beer kegs have the standard Sankey fitting, so you won't have to worry about getting a new coupler just for one beer. That's right. We know how to treat you.
